

ARE BLAZING THE WAY FOR THE BAYONETS OF THE BRITISH

Queen Alexandra inspecting one of a fleet of sixteen ambulances contributed to the British cause by sportsmen. These ambulances are now doing service in the Allied drive on the Western front.

Photo from Janet M. Cummings

THE BOMBARDMENT OF DOUAUMONT. The sky is aflame from the bursting shells, hurled by the French and German artillery. Below the blaze of what seems like a conflagration are the white criss-cross lines of the trenches. The photograph was taken from an aeroplane just before the French recaptured Douaumont in a counter attack.

© Underwood & Underwood

The British drive in Picardy has resulted in the capture of thousands of Germans. The photograph shows a batch of prisoners brought into the British lines after the taking of the first line of trenches.

Central News Photo Service

Vice Admiral Scheer, who commanded the German battleship and battle-cruiser fleet in the North Sea battle with the British, called the greatest naval conflict in history. This photograph was brought to the U. S. by the submarine Deutschland.

Central News Photo Service

One of the German defences on the Western front containing an electric transformer which supplies power for the trenches. This photograph was brought from Germany by the submarine Deutschland.

Central News Photo Service

The British assault on the German trenches at La Boisselle at the beginning of the Allied attack, on July 1.

Central News Photo Service

This photograph was taken at 7 a. m. in a supporting English trench during the British bombardment of German positions in Beaumont-Hamel. The sleeping soldiers are waiting for the word to attack.

Central News Photo Service